the well-being of the agriculturists, were provided in the village. That was the old self-sufficient village community. It was so self-sufficient and self-satisfied that it did not care who the king was. Kings may come and kings may go, but the village communities went on. The question is: Are you aiming at the creation of such self-sufficient village communities at this juncture? The modern tendency, especially the tendency of the Government of India is to centralise power and it is very difficult therefore to have a village republic independent of all others of the Provincial Government, of the Collector and so on. I am not speaking of the Bill here, but of the village republic as conceived by some people. The village republic of 2,000 years ago had nothing to do with the king except paying some tribute to the king. Then the central government had nothing to do with the villages; it allowed the villagers to rule themselves. That government is the best which interferes and governs the least. You cannot have that kind of republic now. But if you say that there must be some village panchayats which will administer certain necessaries of life in the villages subject to some superintendence and control by the Provincial Government through their inspectors and deputy inspectors, I do not know why this thing should be preferred to the present arrangement, because the danger is, when you put a little power in the hands of the people, it is likely to be misused. One of my hon. Friends said that the villagers had commonsense; but if you put power in their hands commonsense will vanish. The Minister for Local Administration knows that too well. Then it is asked: 'What is the remedy? will you not give some power to the villagers?' My answer is:' 'Not yet. Nothing is lost. We are not under a foreign government. Let them wait for some time. Give them more education. Teach them to realize their responsibility. Let us see whether they are able to do some good.' There is nothing wrong in waiting for some time. My Hon. Friend the Minister need not feel that his prestige will suffer if his Bill is not passed. If he sincerely believes that the time is not yet ripe for this reform, that some more time should be given to the villagers to be fit for this reform, let him postpone it. We can take up decentralization later on."

* SRI G. RAJAMANNAR CHETTY:—"Mr. Speaker, those who have struggled for the freedom of the country will certainly welcome a measure of this kind. The freedom that we have fought for and won and which we have promised to extend to the people, is sought to be extended to them by this measure. A reading of the Bill shows that it is only a miniature edition or a village edition of the Municipalities Act. I am afraid the framers of the Bill have not proceeded on right lines: they have not taken into consideration the culture, the genius and the tradition of the villagers. The villager wants freedom to determine his own rights, privileges and needs. We propose to extend to him the right to determine his own needs. I am afraid that the Bill which is going to restrict the individual freedom of the villagers will not be welcomed by all these years. Only the wearer knows where the shoe pinches. The sufferers alone know how these private undertakings have given a hopeless record of their service in constituencies where unfortunately for them, they and they alone could undertake the provision of electricity. After all, what is the basic motive which actuates them to extend their electricity scheme? It is profit and nothing but profit. We know, Madam, even as the Hon. Minister has very wisely put it, you cannot expect private enterprise to volunteer service and extend electricity schemes to places where they cannot expect a reward commensurate with their efforts which they may estimate even as high as 10 or 15 per cent of their investments.

" Madam, it is only the Government with widest and plenitude of resources, with vision and outlook and love for service that can come forward, and behind that Government there must be various Members who can use their whip and who can exercise their influence and bring pressure to bear upon the Hon. Ministers to go this way and that way and see that within a measurable distance of time, the entire Province is electrified. If we are going to leave matters to private enterprise, believe me, Madam, we must have to wait till Doomsday for electricity to be extended to the entire Province. Some Members and curiously for me those behind the Minister himself have raised criticisms and have even used expressions such as ' undertakers ' and I could not understand what they mean by it. I do not know why in this year of 1949, they should be using such slogans which can only be fittingly considered as outmoded slogans of the 19th century laissez faire pattern. In the other countries which I had the honour to visit recently, I understood that they have conceded certain broad fundamentals where private enterprise can flourish and where they cannot. They have acknowledged and accepted the truth and maxim that in the case of any public utility service, State and State alone can undertake them and private enterprises should be warned, ' Hands off the public utility services '. That is the experience which one gets even if one is to turn to England. This used to be the case in other countries, years before we began to think and talk of electricity in this country. They have come to embark upon that course of public enterprise. That alone, I can say, Madam, is a clearest answer to the hon. Members who raise vague doubts against this pronouncement of policy. One or two hon. Members in their legalistic frame of mind even went to the extent of questioning whether the party in power to which they had the honour to belong was right and wise in trying to commit a breach of contract by introducing this Bill. Madam, it looks as though these hon. Members who have raised this issue about contract and all that are still in the early days of 1947 when freedom had not come into our hands. Immediately after freedom had come, much water had flown under the bridge. If we look retrospectively, we can have that insight and understand the problems of revolution. We can see that not even in that long history of 5,000 years, have we witnessed such panoramic changes which have taken a kaleidoscopic turn in our history as
